

selves by means of unrighteous mammon, so that when it fails they may receive you into the eternal habitations.

"He who is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much; and he who is dishonest in a very little is dishonest also in much. If then you have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will entrust to you the true riches? And if you have not been faithful in that which is another's, who will give you that which is your own? No servant can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon."

In this parable it is primarily interesting to note that Christ gives the example of a steward. A steward is answerable to the one for whom he or she works, that is, their master. Stewards do not own the possessions which they care for. Rather, they keep track of and care for the possessions of another. Analogically, as Christians we are to recognize that we too are called to be stewards of that which belongs to God, remembering that our Lord says, "The world and all that is in it is mine." (Psalms 51). Even as the steward cared for the possessions of his master, so too, Christians are to be stewards of the world and everything within the world.

In relating the parable of the steward, it was certainly not the intention of Christ to commend dishonesty. Rather, he was commending shrewdness. Christ is acknowledging that the sons of this world, (that is, those who are not Christians), are shrewder in dealing with other non-Christians than are Christians. The sons of this world use dishonesty to achieve their goals. And in this world, dishonesty is pragmatically effective. Yet those who are in Christ have no place for such dishonesty in their lives. For this reason, Christians will find it difficult to deal with the world in that they are not shrewd in dealing through evil means. In Christ speaking these words, He is acknowledging that God is aware of the plight of the Christian in today's world. It is difficult for an honest person to deal shrewdly with a fundamentally dishonest world.

Even though God is aware of the hardships which Christians face in this world, He still admonishes us to act shrewdly. He tells us to use unrighteous mammon (money) in order to make friends for ourselves, so that when the money fails our friends will welcome us into the eternal habitations. Sometimes people question the meaning of "unrighteous mammon." Several interpretations of this phrase have been suggested. Since the love of money is the root of all evil, there is a sense in which money itself may be referred to as "unrighteous." Or the term "unrighteous mammon" may be meant to suggest that money which was gathered through unrighteous means. If this is an accurate interpretation, Christ is not suggesting that people acquire money through unrighteous means. Rather, he is stating that people who have gathered money through unrighteous means use that money for good purposes penitentially. In either case, Christ is certainly referring to some, if not all, money as "unrighteous" and suggesting that this money be used for making friends.

It is interesting that Christ says to use "unrighteous mammon" to "make friends." Certainly, true friendship cannot be bought. Yet in acting as a responsible steward with the gifts which God has given us, in apportioning His wealth in the way one deems to be most appropriate to God's purposes, one does the will of God. And it is only through doing the will of God that true friendships are possible. As Christians, we are called to understand that we are stewards of God's wealth; we are to use His wealth in order to do His will. By using mammon in this way, we will lead others to see the glory of God. And when they see the glory of God, they will be led to see Christ; and when they enter into Christ they become our brothers and sisters, and truly our friends. In this way, we may use money to make friends. It is for this reason that Christ reminds us that if we are responsible stewards with what God has given us, we may be accepted into the "eternal habitations" (that is, the kingdom of God), by our friends.

Christ reminds us that the riches of this world are not true wealth. For to be truly rich is to accept the love of God. All other riches pale in comparison to the riches that are ours in God. In fact, the riches of this world are not riches at all. The riches of this world decay, whereas true riches are eternal.

While the riches of the world are not riches at all, Christ reminds us that we need to act responsibly in dealing with money. We need to commit all we have to the Lord and use it for his purposes, realizing that all we have is His, and we are only caretakers of the things He allows us to have. In this light, we are to even use money for the glory of God. We are to seek to distribute His wealth in the way that would best serve His needs. Mammon is, in fact, not a measure of true wealth. It is for this reason that Christ reminds us in verse eleven that we need to act responsibly with our money if we are to be worthy of obtaining true riches.

Christ tells us that we cannot serve both God and money. Therefore, we have a choice to make. If we find ourselves serving money, then we may be assured that at that moment we are not serving God. Let this then serve as an indicator for us. Let us completely devote ourselves and all that we have to God. Let us seek to serve only Him in all things. And let us remember that Christ tells us, "for what is exalted among men is an abomination before God." Therefore, let us seek to realize that our true riches are in Christ. In this way we may hope to understand wealth in its proper context. Our true riches are in heaven; and we are called to be responsible stewards of worldly "riches."

MARCH 10: SUNDAY OF THE JUDGE

The Gospel reading for this Sunday is Luke 18:1-14. This Bible reading contains two parables. These two parables will be discussed below.

Sunday of the Judge (Luke 18:1-8)

And he told them a parable, to the effect that they ought always to pray and not lose heart. He said, "In a certain city there was a judge who neither feared God nor regarded man; and there was a widow in that city who kept coming to him and saying, 'Vindicate me against my adversary.' For a while he refused; but afterward he said to himself, 'Though I neither fear
